When two schoolgirls are good singers, and have an equal love of singing, there is likely to be some rivalry between them, and rivalry at a time when an important singing-competition is announced might be expected to lead to difficulties and misunderstandings on both sides.

There certainly appears to be no love lost between the two chief competitors, and it is not surprising, after particular matters have been arranged, that one of them will be obliged to withdraw. However, all is not necessarily lost by a loser, for the realisation of an ambition can sometimes occur when it is least expected.

The reader will discover that the fortunes and misfortunes of Olive, Gerry, Gwyneth, Joey, Brenda and all the rest are often of an extraordinary kind; that schoolmistresses, even headmistresses, can be kind as often as stern; and that generosity is a virtue which has a way of bringing its own startling reward.
